CURRENT PROJECT

The Unfree Labor of Migrant Domestic Workers in Dubai and Singapore

In Singapore and the United Arab Emirates, migrant domestic workers are unfree workers whose legal status is inflexibly contingent on their continuous and sole employment in one household. In both countries, they cannot quit their job without the permission of their employer. This study examines their experience of unfree labor and identifies and analyzes how various stakeholders – states, recruitment agencies, non-governmental advocates, employers and domestic workers – recognize and accordingly attend to their state of unfreedom. This is an ongoing study but we intend to write a book solely on Dubai while producing a series of articles using the data from Singapore. My collaborator Rachel Silvey (Geography, Toronto) and I have gathered 165 in-depth interviews with Filipino and Indonesian domestic workers in Dubai and 100 in Singapore; 65 in-depth interviews with employers in Dubai and Singapore; 100 hours of participant observation in pre-departure orientation seminars in Manila; 50 hours of participant-observation in a recruitment agency in Singapore; 20 interviews with recruitment agency staff; a survey of 200 return migrants in the Philippines; a survey of 100 Middle East bound prospective migrants in Manila; and interviews with government officials in Dubai, Singapore, and Manila.
